

Reuters and their James Pethokoukis reports this morning from New Delhi that the CEO of gigantic PC chip maker Intel is forecasting significantly improved growth in corporate PC spending in 2010, which would be great news for the local north Houston tech market, including huge local PC and tech employer HP.

From the article:

"There is a very good chance corporate spending on PCs will improve significantly in 2010," Otellini told reporters at a news conference in the Indian capital...

I'll be waiting to hear increased confidence from our HP and other related industry clients and colleagues, but this welcome news to read this morning.

Meanwhile I'm still scouring online sources for reviews of the just-released Windows 7. I have a free upgrade to implement at some point. So far what I read is good. But I want Windows 7 to be so great that corporations everywhere around the world replace their entire PC inventory!